

EDDY BROWN OPENS SEASON

Phi Mu Alpha Presents American Violinist Next Thursday.

Music lovers in Columbia will be given a chance next Thursday evening to hear a violinist, American-born and without the European stamp on his name or his personal appearance, when Eddy Brown opens the Phi Mu Alpha concert season at the University Auditorium.

Wherever Eddy Brown has appeared in America, critics have praised him for his well-shod technique, brilliancy of tone, impressive eloquence, colorful composition and versatility in rendition.

In attempting to select a program suitable to his audience, Eddy Brown makes use of his broad experience in this work both in Europe and in America. "It is not sufficient," he said, "that I or any other violinist make a program that will disclose only a command of our chosen instrument. We must, in addition, please the public by providing it with variety of style and content. We must have one or two pieces that are purely technical and which will disclose the kind of violinistic fireworks without which a certain portion of the public would be displeased; we must have a sonata or two of the classic type just to prove that we have a command of the world's oldest and, in the opinion of some people, the best style of musical composition; then we must always have the little, at times insignificant, pieces which are delightful to the average listener because they are short and generally familiar. So far, I have outlined what ought to please all kinds of the average audience."

This versatile violinist's experience in Europe were more varied than those of the average musician. Two years were spent in Russia when that country was seething with turmoil, unrest and revolution. His debut in Germany was made shortly before the outbreak of hostilities between the United States and that country. Later, he was heard one night speaking English with another American. Shouts of "Traitors! Spies!" were heard on every side, and for a moment things looked very black indeed. But the American was equal to the occasion. "I've played the violin here," he said to one of his most threatening neighbors, who chanced to be a member of the orchestra with which he had appeared. The latter recognized Brown instantly and touched for him.

In his extensive concert tours, Eddy Brown has seen many excellent violinists, and has added two exceptional instruments to his collection within the last few years. He bought a Guarnerius in London just prior to his American debut. His most recent addition of this kind is a violin of Spanish origin. He bought it in a little Western town while touring in the United States. He is also the owner of an Amati given to him by his father, and a Stradivarius given by his grandfather.

This noted violinist will not signify his preference for any one of the four instruments he possesses. "They are all my children," he says, "and I do not believe in having a favorite child. One day the Amati will suit my mood, another day it may be the Guarneri, while again it may be one of the others. No, I cannot tell which I shall use at my next recital."

In the future, Mr. Brown intends to devote more time to composing, but prefers to continue in concert work for the time being. He says, "There will be plenty of time for composition when I have finished with my violin-playing. Youth is the time for a violinist to reap the fruits of his labor; age is ever denied such. By all means I shall be a violinist first and a composer later. Yes, I expect always to do some composition for the light opera stage, for it is the work I love and in which I have always been interested."

Eddy Brown's records are known to many people who have not heard him on the stage. He has made records of the more popular and generally known favorites including "To a Wild Rose," "On Miami Shore," and "Rondino" as well as records of more involved and difficult numbers.
